"As someone who is a woman, black, and has a chronic disease, I am very passionate about equity because of my intersectionality and want to fight for everyone like me to receive the specific resources that will help them to thrive."

"The acknowledgement, understanding and embracing of our differences leads to the realization of injustice that sparks the desire to create an equitable world."
If we all develop empathy, we are a step closer to achieving equity.

Why did you want to be a filmmaker?

"Growing up, my mother encouraged me to live my dreams and my father was a lover of films. But during my 20s, I traveled the country performing as a singer-songwriter before I went to grad school."

"I like the collaborative process of filmmaking. It also always forces me to process my feelings. I was a Religion major in undergrad (Harvard University), so existential questions come natural to me."

Tell us about To Dust.

"I received a grant from the Alfred P. Sloan Foundation. They fund projects where science and the arts intersect. Due to the loss of my mother, I was obsessively thinking about her death and body. I was curious about how people find meaning in their tragic losses."

What was it like to work with Matthew Broderick?

"He was very supportive and professional. And so was Géza Röhrig. I was the least experienced in the room, so I had to focus – one foot in front of the other. But I was enthralled. I felt privileged and joy and lucky all at once. It's rare."
Matthew Broderick and Professor Snyder appear on the PBS show "Amanpour & Co".

How did the Jewish community react to the film?

"I wasn't sure how To Dust would land on Jewish community. There's no Jewish monolith. Audiences were definitely passionate about the film, not just its content but the way it's told using comedy to deal with darkness. The movie I wrote is Jewish in its DNA, but I could not anticipate the response."

How does your identity inform your work?

"My Jewish identity frequently informs the way I approach storytelling, even when the content isn't explicitly Jewish. I always lean towards a dialectic of answering questions with more questions, a certain brand of humanism informed by my Jewish upbringing and a spiritual use of comedy to shine light into dark places."

What's next?

"My next film project I'm just directing, so I didn't write it. I'm not an ego-driven director so this is really filling my desire for collaboration. And we're working on a TV pilot based on my experiences traveling the country playing gigs. Each episode will be in a different town. It's in the early stages of development."
